Just Don't Call Me a Model

With their good looks—and even bet genes—these guys are definitely not pose n an era of glass ceilings yet to be broken, one of the few professions in hich women are generally guaranteed to receive better compensation nd more accolades than their male counterparts is modeling. There is no Y holy trinity akin to Naomi Campbell, Christy Turlington, and Linda Vangelista, and you would be hard-pressed to find a male equivalent o Kendall Jenner or Gigi Hadid. (With more than 2 million Instagram ollowers, Lucky Blue Smith has about 10 percent of the reach of Hadid.)

Still, an intrepid group of guys is getting noticed. Some have fashion n their blood: Chase Hill, 17, followed in the footsteps of his model isters Mackinley and Taylor. Others, like Cody Lohan, 20, who got an agent thanks to an Instagram post from sister Lindsay, boast recognizable surnames. The 23-year-old photographer Roberto Rossellini, who was scouted on the streets of New York, sought the counsel of his mother, Isabella, before moving to the other side of the camera.

For most of them, modeling is a way to draw attention to other projects. Thirty-year-old Will Peltz, brother of actress Nicola, squeezes in shoots with Calvin Klein between films. Nyima Ward, 20, the son of the 1990s supermodel Trish Goff and a new favorite of the photographer Steven Meisel, considers himself "more a woodworker, honestly, than a model." Luka Sabbat, 18, a self-described "stylist-entrepreneur-champion and model at request," was discovered at 16, but was initially wary of the industry. "I didn't fuck with it—it looked wack," he recalls. He's since come around (with a gentle nudge from his father), walking for Yeezy and popping up in a Tommy Hilfiger campaign. Meanwhile, Brandon Thomas Lee, 20, the son of Pamela Anderson and Tommy Lee, and a star of Dolce & Gabbana's spring campaign, didn't need any convincing. "It's great to have your face plastered on stuff so everyone can get to know you," he says. "People would say, 'Okay, for the last year, you've done more modeling work than acting.' But I like to classify myself as just an actor. What I do to achieve that can go a thousand different ways." VANESSA LAWRENCE
