"Even if they perceived me as beautiful, that was not how I perceived myself. Therefore, I always looked for what was wrong and how I could change that."

LULU DE FREITAS

There's an air of confidence in Lulu De Freitas that's immediately apparent. She's warm but direct, her cropped hair with dark curls framing her striking hazel eyes. Looking intently, she explains that she has an important message to share. But first, she talks a little about how she got here. Modelling is something she's had much experience with, having been one for 13 years and with an extensive portfolio, her optimism and poise are evident. Originally from Venezuela, she's now been in London for four years. "I came for three months, but then I ended up staying. I love it here." There's a joke about the weather, considering today's forecast and her home. She didn't come here for that, she laughs. "I came here for the opportunities." Her work has taken her to Mexico, LA and through Europe and to Australasia. One of her favourites was Sydney. "It was summer. It was beautiful. I made many friends, and going to the beach after work is lovely."

Lulu loves acting and music and she's currently studying production. "I would love to have music in my life. I am still determining how I will do it, but probably more production. I love the creative process. I look up to many people like Alicia Keys. She has produced so much music that people don't even realise." But, Lulu maintains she prefers to be behind the scenes advocating and trailblazing for women in the industry. There aren't enough, she says, recounting a story about a female friend back home, an MD in the music business, who continues to experience prejudice. It's a bit different here, though, but there still needs to be more opportunities for women, she says. Lulu is also looking for an agent to assist with acting roles, having previously shot two short films and won awards at festivals. Her talents are many.

What she wants to discuss, though, she says, is something of much greater significance. She conveys a story about having breast implants, and, upon realizing that they were a detrimental addition, she decided to remove them. "I want to talk about learning to love ourselves. People say, 'It's easy for you. You are a model', but that is the problem: when you have some dysmorphia, you don't see the beauty yourself. You always think you must change something in yourself, and that's exactly my case. We have normalised plastic surgery. With dysmorphia, you think I will just pay for this and fix the problem. When we do that, we ignore the real issue. We are not fixing the real problem. We are destroying our bodies." What Lulu believes is that we must work much more on self-love and acceptance. "Anything exterior will not give us that feeling of finally being okay. When you don't first work on that, it doesn't matter how many surgeries you go through. You are never going to feel happy enough with yourself." It seems it has been a long journey for Lulu in that regard, but there's a sense she's very much on the way to finding what she's been searching for.
